

I'm appalled that any consideration at all is being given to "relaxing" the NJ Telemarketing DoNotCall Law. I think if anything other states in the US should follow suit with New Jersey to make their law as stringent as ours so they, too, can claim a 100% drop in telemarketing calls.

I understand that telemarketers also have to earn a living but they've become an unnecessary nuisance and some are relentless in their quest to do their job; they simply refuse to take no for an answer and continue to harrangue and harrass the person they are calling until one simply has to hang up. It's annoying and frustrating and now this option New Jerseyans were given to stop telemarketers is being reconsidered because of pressure from the very source of the original problem.

As the expression goes..."If it ain't broke, don't fix it!".
